Severe Weather Threat

Midwest & Ohio Valley

- A significant severe weather outbreak is unfolding across the Midwest and Ohio Valley on Friday, placing more than 143 million people under alert.
- The threat of these dangerous conditions is expected to persist and potentially intensify into early next week.
- A round of severe storms is actively being tracked across Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana and Arkansas on Friday morning.
- Storms threaten quarter-sized hail and damaging winds.
- The most significant concern for Friday lies in the afternoon and evening hours particularly for southern Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky.
- This "bull's-eye" region faces a high potential for strong tornadoes, possibly EF-2 or stronger, and there is a possibility for a "high-end long-track tornado."
- "We're not even talking about just the potential for tornadoes forming, but some of the tornadoes could be particularly strong, producing winds that are well over 115 mph," FOX Weather Meteorologist Britta Merwin said.
- Storm coverage will continue to become more widespread, and several clusters will move east.
- The FOX Forecast Center notes that during the evening hours, several "bow echoes" will move through the northern Tennessee Valley, resulting in extensive wind damage in swaths with widespread wind gusts potentially exceeding 75 mph.
- If storms can maintain their strength overnight, they could impact parts of the mid-Atlantic and Northeast on Saturday.
- Damaging wind gusts look to be the largest threat, the FOX Forecast Center said.
